One of the main computational challenges in digital fingerprinting systems is the complexity of colluder identification. Inspired by compressive sensing approaches for support recovery of sparse vectors, we propose a novel list-decoding approach for partial colluder identification. We also derive formulas for the minimum codelength required for identifying a nonzero fraction of colluders based on noiseless and noisy measurements, using simple single-step correlation maximization techniques.